

DISCLAIMER

This is a list of the dinnerware tested by KUTV and Kenyon Consulting, Inc. on November 16, 2007. The tests were done using an X-Ray Fluorescence Analyzer (XRF Gun). The device can be used to determine if there is a measurable amount of lead in an item. Any reading above a 1.0 on the XRF Gun is considered unacceptable by the Division of Environmental Quality (DEQ) and the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA). Neither of these agencies regulates the import of dinnerware into the United States. That falls under the control of the Food and Drug Administration (FDA). The FDA states that all imported dinnerware is within established standards. There are no regulations that require a manufacturer or retailer to disclose the existence of lead in your dinnerware if the level is within these standards. The levels found in our tests show a varying amount of lead exists in different plates, but the XRF Gun CANNOT measure the potential for lead leaching from your plates into food.

This listing of information confirms ONLY what was found in the physical dinnerware that was tested. This does not demonstrate that the same dinnerware or design in your home may or may not contain lead. Due to dinnerware being manufactured in different factories at various times, there is a likelihood that a particular plate design that tested negative for lead for us may actually test positive at another time. In short, if you hold plates that are the same as what is listed here, you should not assume that your plate would have the exact same result if tested for lead.

If you wish to have your dinnerware tested for lead, you have a few options. You may contact your local health department and ask if they have information on any “Environmental Consulting” company in your area that uses an XRF Gun. Or you can contact DataChem Labs to do a lead leach test. The test is established by the FDA, and the level of compliance is 2.0 parts per million.

The cost is approximately $40 per test.

Commonly asked questions:

What plates should I buy?

We cannot answer that. All we can tell you is that as an observation from our tests, certain brands listed below in green tested with no measurable lead.

As a personal observation, dishes that contained colorful designs (IE: Christmas themes, fruit patterns, farm scenes, etc) tended to test positive for containing lead.

How many plates did you test?

More than 1,500.

How many plates that you tested had lead?

About 30 percent; or 3 of every 10.

Were most of the plates with lead from China?

Not according to our results. Though many did come from China, some of the worst offenders came from European countries and even right here in the United States.

What dishes tested the worst?

As you might imagine, lead crystal goblets and plates all tested positive with VERY high levels of lead.

As a personal observation, dishes that contained colorful designs (IE: Christmas themes, fruit patterns, farm scenes, etc) tended to test positive for containing lead.

Also as a personal observation, the older the dish the more likely it was to have a higher level of lead...however that did not, in any way, exempt new dishes from containing lead.

Below is a partial list of the plates we tested on Friday, November 17, 2007. It is only partial because we have disregarded plates that did not have any identification stamp on them.

Brands in which we tested 3 or more plates, and they all tested POSITIVE for containing lead, are highlighted in RED

Brands in which we tested 3 or more, and some contained lead and some did not, are highlighted in YELLOW.

Brands in which we tested 3 or more plates, and they all tested NEGATIVE for containing lead, are highlighted in GREEN.

You will notice a vast array of miscellaneous brands and descriptions in this list. Wherever possible, we gathered information from the back of plates tested, and printed it as seen. Many plates did not include brand names or styles. What you see is the information provided.
